RESEARCH PROPOSAL

Phytochemical and Antimicrobial Evaluation of Selected Essential Oils from Traditional Medicinal Plants

Objective

The purpose of this study is to evaluate the possible phytochemical and antimicrobial properties of traditional medicinal herbs utilized in Tamil Nadu, India. The most effective method for essential oil extraction will be identified as part of this study. To identify chemicals and their relative percentage compositions, GC-MS analysis will also be used to examine the essential oils.

1. Brief Background:

Since the dawn of time, people have utilized natural resources to enhance their health, and many of the drugs we use today were initially sourced using ingredients found in nature. Numerous antimicrobial agents from synthetic and natural sources were previously discovered for the treatment and management of infectious diseases (Kobede et al., 2022). There is no evidence that people in the past sought synthetic drugs to treat their illnesses; rather, they made do with what they could easily procure from nature. When they started experimenting with plants, they found that most of them could be utilized as food while others were either poisonous or had medicinal purposes (Jeyare and Petrocelli 1997; Singh and Akhwa, 1996; Orwasi et al., 2021).

1.1 Essential oils

When essential oils contain a variety of chemically active substances, such as phenolics, fatty acids, aldehydes, and terpenes, they are at their most potent. These constituents from chemical substances or secondary metabolism in a form of defense. These substances work together in a complex way to confuse the bacteria's sensory organs (Diedel et al., 2019).

1.2 Ethnopharmacology

It is possible to think of the word ethnopharmacology, which was first used in 1967, as a key element of the scientific analysis of conventional plant treatment. Ethnopharmacology, which is commonly confused with the study of traditional remedies, is the practice of empirically validating on the assumption that many people and ethnic groups use as drugs.

2. Methodology

2.1 Collection and identification of plant materials

The parameters used to choose the plants for the study will be based on their ethnopharmacology, pharmacology, availability, and flavor that might provide chemical evidence of interest. The plant samples will be collected from the local communities around Begunur Reserve Forest, which is located in the Tiruvallur district of Tamil Nadu. Additionally, this study will be conducted at Kanganadai Arts and Science College (Autonomous), Department of Botany in Coimbatore, to check that the proper technique for botanical identification of plant materials is used in comparison to Botanical Survey of India, Southern Circle, Coimbatore, Tamil Nadu, (Vascular specimen number) recognized and verified the collected plant material.

2.2 Extraction of essential oils from the Traditional Medicinal plants

2.2.1 Solvent extraction and steam distillation

The organic solvent extraction method is commonly used in industrial procedures to produce acceptably pure essential oils. The procedure uses organic solvents to extract organic compounds. The organic solvent is recovered at decreased pressure to create crude extracts, which typically require additional washing in the presence of alcohol to produce pure essential oils. This approach is not advised due to its high cost, high combustibility, and detrimental environmental effects (Chakrabarti, 2010; Perera et al., 2021). The most popular and simple method is steam distillation. This procedure requires a high heating temperature, which could lead to breakdown and a meager supply of essential oil.

2.3 Essential oils Analysis

Essential oil components can be analyzed and identified using gas chromatography-mass spectrometry (GC-MS). The use of the Gas Chromatography-Mass Spectrometry (GC-MS) technique allows for both qualitative and quantitative analysis of the chemical composition of essential oils. Identification of the principal components is usually carried out by the comparison of Gas Chromatography retention times with Mass Spectrometry data of reference standards. Chemical structures of active constituents will be determined using 1D & 2D NMR Nuclear Magnetic Resonance (NMR) and High-resolution mass spectrometry techniques. In cooperation with Bharathiar University, the analysis will be conducted.

2.4 Antimicrobial Activities of Essential oils

Direct Micrological screening of the extracted essential oils for antimicrobial and antifungal activities will be conducted in the standard microbiology laboratory at Coimbatore.

2.4.1 Sample preparation

The essential oils are poorly soluble in water and this can lead to difficulty in determining the MIC and MLC activity of the oils. DMSO is the common solvent used in sample preparation, however, the oils could still result in low solubility.

2.4.2 Antimicrobial activity screening

Using the agar cup diffusion method (Datta & Jitendra, 1987) and an appropriate solvent, various essential oil extracts are tested for antimicrobial properties (Datta, 1986), however, there are three major issues of such analysis. For each bacterial species, a common antibiotic like gentamicin will be used as a control.

2.4.3 Phytochemical screening

The extract will undergo a preliminary phytochemical qualitative analysis as per conventional practices determining the presence or absence of physiologically active chemicals or secondary metabolites in each of the plant constituents. Alkaloids, saponins, cardiac glycosides, flavonoids, phenolic compounds, steroids, terpenes, and tannins will be identified as the major phytochemical constituents in 10% methanol extracts of each plant using modified standard procedures (Kumar, 2017; Kobede et al., 2022). This method was used in a previous study on the combined antimicrobial effect of essential oils.

2.5 Plans for Data Processing and Analysis

Using SPSS software, the microbiological data will be statistically analyzed to evaluate the mean differences of essential activities for various essential oils and controls. The expected data will determine the type of analysis. Additionally, the GC-MS equipment will provide pertinent data for chemical constituents.
